OVC TRIBAL GRANTEE SPOTLIGHT

Tribe: Native Village of Hooper Bay/RuralCAP, Inc.

Program: Bay Haven Shelter

Award: FY18 VSSA, FY19 CTAS PA 7, FY19 TVSSA, FY21 TVSSA

What approach did your Program take to address vicarious trauma?

Bay Haven has been open since June of 2020. All our staff were hired locally and trained during a pandemic. All training was provided via teleconference where staff were oriented by their Community Development Manager based in Anchorage as well as our new partner, Alaska Native Women's Resource Center. No amount of training prepared our team for the true impact of helping our people through the crisis they were experiencing.

Rural CAP
Rural Alaska Community Action Program, Inc.

L to R: Theresa Nanuk (Victim Service/Legal Advocate); Cheryl Smart (Shelter Coordinator); Thomasina Smith (Victim Service Advocate, Overnight); Alvonna Joe (Victim Service Advocate, Day); Eunice Charlie (Community Wellness Specialist); Marietta Smith (Child Advocacy Center Coordinator); Valerie Chadwick (Community Development Manager)

What challenges did you overcome in addressing vicarious trauma?

The challenge lied mainly in how to coordinate training and live support for staff and consumers during a pandemic when travel was restricted. Bay Haven reached out to one of many people in our network system, the Child Welfare Academy, who provided a sixteen-hour session on the impacts of our own healing from generational trauma while helping others through their painful journey.

“OVC has provided great support through training and technical assistance. Through webinars, networking and contact with our TA Provider, we were able to request that monthly calls between other OVC grantees be set up so that we could learn from other Tribes about their successes and challenges and feel that we weren’t all alone.”

Valerie Chadwick, Community Development Manager

What recommendations do you have for other Tribal Programs to address vicarious trauma?

You need to pull together and identify the impact of abuse has on your team. For us, we saw our trauma response manifest mainly through staff interactions. There was an increase in calls to the Human Resources department with staff conflicts, and the concerns they had with each other couldn't quite be explained. This caused some staff turnover, which in turn, added more stress in longer shifts for those who were still here. The simple solution was to provide “conflict resolution” support. However, because our team is 100% Yup'ik and our Community Development Manager is also Yup'ik, she was able to recognize and understand why the group dynamic had changed once we began serving people in crisis. We started holding weekly staff meetings so each person felt supported and their concerns were heard and validated.

OVC TRIBAL GRANTEE SPOTLIGHT

Tribe: Valdez Native Tribe
Program: Valdez Tribal Victim Services
Award: FY19 VSSA

What approach did your Program take to address vicarious trauma?

The Valdez Tribal Victim Services Program staff works diligently not only to connect with their community but also to support one another through the impact of vicarious trauma. Staff works on traditional beading, hosts community gathering circles (virtual and in person), and subsistence fishing and gathering. But one thing that has been crucial to the program is sharing their stories. The Program began a video series project. This started by staff sharing their own healing journeys, not realizing just how receptive the community would be. These practices continue to uplift the Program staff and ultimately provide victims of crime access to healing resources and support as well.

What challenges did you overcome in developing this project?

One of the challenges the Program faced is lack of understanding of the cultural practices specifically related to the Alaskan Native people. The Program's goal is to honor individuals sharing their personal healing journey, using their own words, with out re-victimizing or using their voice to fit a statistical narrative. The empowering video series has been a huge success reaching farther than the Valdez Tribal Victim Services Program could have imagined. They have received an outpouring of gratitude for the series honesty and for shedding light on the reality in Alaskan Native communities.

What recommendations do you have for other Tribal Programs to address vicarious trauma?

Encourage Program Staff to find creative ways that tie in cultural practices when focusing on individual healing journeys, as well as the victims of crime the program supports.

Helping survivors control the disclosure of their personal information protects them from being re-victimized during proceedings. Among these protections are laws affording victims' privilege and/or confidentiality over communications with certain service providers, as well as general victims' rights to privacy and protection. This interactive session from Unified Solutions and the National Crime Victim Law Institute will discuss sources of privacy, analyze the differences between privacy, privilege and confidentiality, review considerations and promising practices for protecting privacy when working with survivors, and describe how victims' rights attorneys can partner with advocates to fight for victim privacy.
